Head of Public International Partnerships, University of Cambridge

Session 10: Helping researchers collaborate internationally in an increasingly complex global research landscape.

Renata Schaeffer (CAM) will open the session by delving into the challenges and strategies of fostering international research collaborations amidst an intricate global landscape, highlighting the efforts made by Cambridge in this regard. Jonathan Dampney from ANU will also provide insights into the Australian experience.

Senior Officers are then invited to consider how we can build research for the good of the world, around complex problems that require international collaboration, while being sensitive to political issues and an ever increasing complex research landscape. Many of our universities are grappling with a situation where increasing pressure from governments can conflict with academic freedom, and academic freedom runs headlong into cancel culture. How do we safeguard the integrity and autonomy of our universities and research initiatives?
